PLANT PERCEPTION.

Vegetation Feels, and Some of Its Approaches Intelligence.
It is not a characteristic of a few plants, but a quality of all, according to Prof. Pfeffer, a German biologist. It is commonly exhibited in movements too slow to be seen, but the microscope shows the bacterium hurrying toward its prey at the rate of three to five times its own length a second, while a man traverses only half his height per second. Bacteria are not a condition of irritability, and belong neither to plants nor the lower animals. But plants exhibit a variety of sensitivities equal to that of animals, while in the case of perception the vegetable kingdom has the advantage. Bacteria are attracted by a billionth of a trillionth of a milligram of meat extract or of oxygen—infinitesimal quantities, which we can neither weigh nor appreciate.
